

Valedictorian speech:

Good afternoon families, guests, the faculty and my fellow classmates.

It is a true honor to stand before you today as the valedictorian of the graduating class of IIS.

Today isn't just a celebration of academic success- instead it's a celebration of growth, resilience, friendship, and the many memories that brought us here. And none of it would have been possible if not for the remarkable individuals who guided us along the way.

To our amazing school leaders: Thank you, Mrs. Ige for your steady leadership and thank you for providing an environment where excellence is the standard, but kindness is the culture. Mrs. Helen, your kindness and grace brought warmth to every corner of the school. Mr. Ibironke, thank you for your wisdom and encouragement. And Mrs. Adeyemi, your dedication and care has touched us more than we can ever say. We are deeply thankful.

To our teachers: you've been patient, Kind, and occasionally confused when we all looked back at you blankly only to discover not one of us had opened Google Classroom. You were there before every exam, offering last minute help, encouragement, and answering the same questions again and again, you even showed up on days you didn't have to, just to make sure we were ready and that effort would not go unnoticed.

To my parents and grandparents : thank you for the love, sacrifice, and support. I could not have done this without you.

And on behalf of all of us—thank you to every proud parent, and family member. Even when we doubted ourselves, you believed in us. Your never failing support carried us through this journey.

Most importantly to my fellow graduates, what a journey it's been. Through deadlines, exams, group projects, and school events, we've grown stronger, smarter, united and maybe into a slightly sleep-deprived versions of ourselves.

So as we venture into a world full of uncertainty, let's remember, we turned chaos into memories and failure into growth. If we can survive projects with a battery of inconveniences we can survive anything.

Here's to our next chapter, may we carry forward the spirit of IIS wherever we go.

Thank you, and congratulations, Class of 2025.
